“ Growing up Martha was a precocious child whose energy and curiosity frustrated our grandmother who cared for us during the day while our mother worked during World War II. She was born with a lust for life at a time when girls were expected to be demure and passive. That wasn't her style. She was feisty and at the same time fiercely loyal to her six siblings. She had a dream for a life of independence colored by the "things that are more excellent"...like a family of her own, a husband who would love and respect her, and above all children. She had an eye for beauty, decor, and stylish clothing early in her life. She was undeniably beautiful with a personal style that sort of left you breathless. That was my sister in the early years.
